

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

Charles S. Hyneman, past president of the American Political Science Association, is distinguished professor of political science emeritus at Indiana University. His writings include the widely acclaimed Bureaucracy in a Democracy, The Supreme Court on Trial, and (with Charles E. Gilbert) Popular Government in America. Currently he is engaged in study of the pamphlet literature of the founding period of the American republic.

Stephen J. Tonsor, professor of intellectual history at the University of Michigan, is the author of Tradition and Reform in Education. He has published widely in both scholarly and popular journals and is regarded nationally as a principal spokesman of conservatism. Currently he is resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and is doing research for a definitive work on the idea of equality.

George W. Carey is professor of government at Georgetown University, editor of The Political Science Reviewer, and editorial advisor of Modern Age.

Arthur Shenfield, British economist, writer, and barrister-at-law, has been regents' professor of economics at the University of California and visiting professor at the Universities of Chicago, Dallas and San Diego, and at Temple University. He resides in Old Windsor, Berkshire, and is a past president of the Mont Pelerin Society. This article was presented as a paper to the Mont Pelerin Society meeting in Madrid in September, 1979.

Rod Preece is professor of political science at Wilfrid Laurier University, Ontario. He has written two books on German politics and has contributed articles on various aspects of conservatism to the Canadian Journal of Political Science, the Canadian Journal of Political and Social Theory, and The Eighteenth Century. He is a riding vice president of the Canadian Conservatives.

Henry McDonald, a writer who lives in Washington, D.C., is currently working on a book, The Ethics of Comparative Religion: A Philosophical Investigation, to be published next year by the University-Press of America.

Aileen S. Kraditor is professor of history at Boston University and has published widely in the fields of political and social theory.

Robert Drake, professor of English at the University of Tennessee, is the author of three books of stories: Amazing Grace, The Single Heart, and The Burning Bush. This story is part of his family memoirs, The Home Place, which will be published this fall by the Memphis State University Press.

The book reviews are contributed by: George A. Panichas, professor of English, University of Maryland; Philip F. Lawler, managing editor of Policy Review; Thomas Molnar, professor of French literature at the City University of New York and professor of European intellectual history at C. W. Post College; Donald Pond, distinguished musicologist and author who resides in Santa Barbara; J. David Hoeveler, Jr., professor of history, University of Wisconsin; J. W. Cooke, professor of history, Tennessee State University; C. P. Ives, book review editor of Studies in Burke and His Time; Arthur Kemp, Charles M. Stone professor of money and credit at Claremont Men's College; Anthony Kerrigan, well-known author, critic, and translator-in-residence at the University of Notre Dame; G. B. Tennyson, professor of English, University of California, Los Angeles and a former Fulbright scholar; Samuel T. Francis, member of the research staff, The Heritage Foundation, Washington, D.C.; Janos Radvanyi, professor of history, Mississippi State University. John Tasker and Michael Berdinner are professors of English at the University of Tripoli.